I would like to support Option 2. It is plain common sense to have anything that is modified (in any way) regulated. It seems to me that governing bodies are usually far more willing to please big business and to save money, than they are to protect individuals; you may or may not be one of them. I have been plagued with illness for the past 10 years and have a weak digestive system at the best of times and I need to know what I am putting into my body; that should be my right. There has to be full labeling and testing of all products derived from new GM techniques. So option 2 has to be the one to choose. It's all very well to ask for scientific proof, but the whole point is that we don't know what risks they may pose in the future. That's why governing bodies need to monitor, test, check, label and do anything they deem necessary to protect the future health of the general public. We always seem to be way behind other health conscious countries like Austria and Norway. PLEASE DO THE RIGHT THING.

Thanks for listening,

Mary Vice
